Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .will be for superior children an age of arrest which is in part determined by the degree of brightness (the I. Q.), in part by life age, and in part by the efficiency limit of the Scale as a measure of intelligence. It is therefore peculiarly difficult to fix the age of arrest among superior children. The final appeal must be repeated tests of the same individuals. It is safe to assume, however, that the age of arrest is probably not earlier than 13 years of age. The rate of growth of superior children will depend partly upon life age and partly upon the final mental level. As the mental age approaches the upper limit of the measuring Scale the subject finds it increasingly difficult to maintain his rate of development. Hence, after the mental age reaches a certain point we may expect the rate of development to decline. When a 10-year-old subject tests 15, for example, he has more difficulty in maintaining an I. Q. rate of 150 than when he was 6 and tested 9, for the scale becomes increasingly more difficult in the upper ranges, relatively as well as absolutely. He has less and less range of tests over which to register his intelligence. But as long as the mental age remains under, say, 15 or 16 years the rate of growth will be either a function of age, mental age or degree of brightness. We have seen that the rate of growth...
